OREM — A clover-like interchange is gradually taking shape at the intersection of Provo Canyon Road (U.S. 189) and Eighth North, but relief for heavy traffic passing through the intersection is still a year away, according to Utah Department of Transportation officials.

The interchange, part of $6.2 million project that includes the widening of Eighth North and parts of Provo Canyon Road, won't be completed until the end of next summer.

UDOT officials said the interchange will be free-flowing and will consist of two bridges built over the Provo River where Eighth North meets the canyon. One structure will handle southbound traffic turning onto Eighth North from Provo Canyon Road. The second will be for traffic turning off Eighth North and heading south on Provo Canyon Road.

A third structure, for traffic turning off Eighth North to go north on the canyon road, will be elevated over the intersection. The original Eighth North bridge has already been removed, and one of the new bridges completed. The structures will include retaining walls and require about 4,000 yards of concrete, officials said.

The first phase of the project, begun last spring, included the widening of Eighth North from State Street to Sixth East. The road has been widened to four lanes, including a

"It should be bid now, but we're still acquiring rights of way," said Anderson. "Utility relocation has also held up the project, but we should be able to advertise bids by about Sept. 28."

Anderson said both the widening of Eighth North and completion of the four-mile northward.

Anderson said the federal government is funding about three-fourths of the costs of the project, with the remainder being picked up by the state.

Classes will cover pain management, cancer treatments, communication and listening skills, the grief process and the volunteer's role in the home and in working with other caregivers.

Volunteers serve a vital need in keeping terminally ill patients at home, where they are more comfortable and surrounded by loved ones in a familiar environment. The volunteers are able to provide temporary relief for family members, run errands, give emotional support and comfort and help the patient achieve a sense of dignity and worth in their final days.

The training sessions will be conducted by Barbara Jacobson, supervisor of services for the terminally ill, and Phyllis Hansen, medical social worker and coordinator of volunteers. Both men and women volunteers are needed.
